

Bowel cancer? Me?
How could that be?
I've been so fit throughout my life, eaten porridge, been as regular as clockwork. My diet was always well balanced. There has been no history of cancer in the family. Cancer? Me?

Bleeding led to a CT scan, and, after that, there was no doubt about it. I was told by the surgeon that bowel surgery was very successful and so about eight years ago, I had the first operation. But this turned into eight, each worse than the previous one.

And, I've ended up with a bag and terminal cancer.

A couple of personal details will set the scene. I am now 72. I'm married and have twin sons who are about 40. I'm a retired academic from Swinburne University, Melbourne, where my last position was as director of the doctorate in business administration program.

Why so many surgeries you ask? Every six months after the first operation, the cancer kept on reappearing at the point where the bowel was joined.

After the fourth one, a spot appeared on my liver. I had surgery for that. While lying on the gurney after the operation and just after coming to consciousness, the surgeon came up and said, "Sorry, there's nothing we can do for you. You have so many spots on your liver, I didn't know where to start."

Bald news indeed, and delivered with such sensitivity!

After being discharged from the hospital I recovered quite quickly but one day I found myself in a panic attack about dying.

My wife knew. My sons knew. But who to talk to? I mentioned this to a friend who suggested I ring Dying With Dignity Victoria for a talk. I was so panicked that I did just that.

The secretary, Rowena White, answered the phone and I poured out my woes and debilitating fear to her.

She listened with astonishing care. She didn't interrupt my tearful, fearful statement. And she sympathised in clear terms with astonishing understanding.

When I ran out of words, she indicated she would get Rodney Syme, the chairman of Dying With Dignity Victoria, to phone me back.

I didn't imagine he would. To my surprise he did, twice. I was not a member of the organisation, just one more person in despair.

I met Dr Syme, who brought me to the inevitable position that dying is part of life, we just don't know when that's going to be.

He said that preparation was the key. Prepare to be able to make a choice when the going gets tough.

That down-to-earth sensible talk helped me to shift gear into acceptance of the inevitable. I was also having a couple of heart issues so I asked my heart specialist whether any of the heart pills I am taking would enable me to end my life.

Unwilling as he was to say so, he nevertheless told me that one of the pills I was taking would indeed end my life. I would go to sleep and then my heart would stop.

For that bit of information I am eternally grateful. My abject fear of death ended at that point. The pills gave me choice.

Good Lord, we don't let that happen to our cats and dogs but we allow it with humans.

My loving little dog died in my arms a few years back. Yes, I wept, but he was saved from suffering.

Politicians, of any persuasion, fearful of the next election, don't take into account those with terrible, painful, terminal illnesses. And it's not just cancer, but motor neurone disease, Parkinson's disease, Alzheimer's and so on.

It turned out that I started bleeding from the bowel six months after the liver surgery so the cancer was back in the bowel and I changed hospitals and surgeons. I would've bled to death had I not had surgery. The cancer was back on the join yet again. So there was nothing for it but to have more surgery. This time they found that there were two spots on my liver but nothing else. The first surgeon had got it very wrong.

I had both bowel surgery and liver surgery at the same time. But pathological examination of the removed bowel showed there was a large cancer which no one knew anything about. It was very flat, very thin, and was not detected by the CT scans. That explained why the cancer kept appearing on the join. It was upstream of the join. Fortunately that ended the bowel cancer.

I then had chemotherapy and painful as it was and still is, that seemed to end my problems.

But cancer is a sneaky beast. I had a follow up CT scan after the chemotherapy and there were two spots on my liver.

So in March this year I had yet another resection. It was a difficult operation because of the placement of the spots. Within three weeks of the operation I contracted septicaemia and had invasive thoracic surgery for that. I recovered.

But in June, this year I had a follow up CT scan. There were spots on my liver, lungs, and most probably stomach. I was told that there was no more surgery to be had.

For that bit of information I am eternally grateful.

My abject fear of death ended at that point. The pills gave me choice.

I was in control of my life and that would save me from palliative care and people who could keep me alive but in a terrible state. But I also came to understand that it was an offence for anyone to be near me or assist me in any way to depart this world because of debilitating painful illness. How silly is that?

Politicians, praise be not all, but unwillingly most by far, are unwilling to develop policy for physician-assisted death in the face of terminal illness which is causing great suffering. And most of the physicians I have dealt with are unwilling to talk about it. This is also true of my oncologist. He didn't want to discuss anything about euthanasia.

Good Lord, we don't let that happen to our cats and dogs but we allow it with humans.

My loving little dog died in my arms a few years back. Yes, I wept, but he was saved from suffering.

Politicians, of any persuasion, fearful of the next election, don't take into account those with terrible, painful, terminal

That's the way things are. I don't know how much longer I will have to live, months, a year.

But I am at peace. I have all that I need to depart this world and when the going gets rough that's what I will do. My wife and family are fully informed about this. I have told all my friends. Some are shocked, but by far most say I am courageous.

I don't think about the end, nor do I look forward to it. I have led a most fortunate life. I am surrounded by family and friends. Sometimes we cry together for what is ending. Sometimes we laugh.

After these experiences, I have three pieces of advice. First, get a second opinion. For all my university degrees, I simply believed the first surgeon. I never asked for a second opinion.

The second is for politicians. Don't be so lily livered. Take a stand against suffering and illnesses which are awful and go on and on. Terminal is just that. So let people end their suffering.

And finally I have advice for the readers of this article. Join the cause and support change. Join an organisation such as Dying With Dignity. This article was originally published at <http://theconversation.edu.au>

Dowel cancer? Me?
How could that be?
I've been so fit
throughout my life,
eaten porridge, been
as regular as clockwork. My diet was always well balanced. There has been no history of cancer in the family. Cancer? Me?

Bleeding led to a CT scan, and,
after that, there was no doubt about it. I was told by the surgeon that bowel surgery was very successful and so about eight years ago, I had the first operation. But this turned into eight, each worse than the previous one.

And, I've ended up with a bag
and terminal cancer.
A couple of personal details will set the scene. I am now 72. I'm married and have twin sons who are about 40. I'm a retired academic from Swinburne University, Melbourne, where my last position was as director of the doctorate in business administration program.

Why so many surgeries you ask?
Every six months after the first operation, the cancer kept on reappearing at the point where the bowel was joined.
After the fourth one, a spot appeared on my liver. I had surgery for that. While lying on the gurney after the operation and just after coming to consciousness, the surgeon came up and said, "Sorry, there's nothing we can do for you. You have so many spots on your liver. I didn't know where to start."

Bald news indeed, and delivered with such sensitivity!
After being discharged from the hospital I recovered quite quickly but one day I found myself in a panic attack about dying.

My wife knew. My sons knew
But who to talk to? I mentioned this to a friend who suggested I ring Dying With Dignity Victoria for a talk. I was so panicked that I did just that.

The secretary, Rowena White, answered the phone and I poured out my woes and debilitating fear to her.

She listened with astonishing care. She didn't interrupt my tearful, fearful statement. And she sympathised in clear terms with astonishing understanding.

When I ran out of words, she indicated she would get Rodney Syme, the chairman of Dying With Dignity Victoria, to phone me back.

I didn't imagine he would. To my surprise he did, twice.
I was not a member of the organisation, just one more person in despair.

I met Dr Syme, who brought me to the inevitable position that dying is part of life, we just don't know when that's going to be.
He said that preparation was the key. Prepare to be able to make a choice when the going gets tough.

That down-to-earth sensible talk helped me to shift gear into acceptance of the inevitable. I was also having a couple of heart issues so I asked my heart specialist whether any of the heart pills I am taking would enable me to end my life.

Unwilling as he was to say so, he nevertheless told me that one of the pills I was taking would indeed end my life. I would go to sleep and then my heart would stop.

For that bit of information I am illnesses. And it's not just cancer, but motor neurone disease, Parkinson's disease, Alzheimer's and so on.

It turned out that I started bleeding from the bowel six months after the liver surgery so the cancer was back in the bowel and I changed hospitals and surgeons. I would've bled to death had I not had surgery. The cancer was back on the join yet again. So there was nothing for it but to have more surgery. This time they found that there were two spots on my liver but nothing else. The first surgeon had got it very wrong.

I had both bowel surgery and liver surgery at the same time. But pathological examination of the removed bowel showed there was a large cancer which no one knew anything about. It was very flat, very thin, and was not detected by the CT scans. That explained why the cancer kept appearing on the join. It was upstream of the join.
Fortunately that ended the bowel cancer.

I then had chemotherapy and painful as it was and still is, that seemed to end my problems.

But cancer is a sneaky beast. I had a follow up CT scan after the chemotherapy and there were two spots on my liver.
So in March this year I had yet another resection. It was a difficult operation because of the placement of the spots. Within three weeks of the operation I contracted septicaemia and had invasive thoracic surgery for that.
I recovered.

But in June, this year I had a follow up CT scan. There were spots on my liver, lungs, and most probably stomach. I was told that there was no more surgery to be had.

For that bit of information I am eternally grateful.
My abject fear of death ended at that point. The pills gave me choice.

I was in control of my life and that would save me from palliative care and people who could keep me alive but in a terrible state.
But I also came to understand that it was an offence for anyone to be near me or assist me in any way to depart this world because of debilitating painful illness. How silly is that?

Politicians, praise be not all, but unhappily most, by far, are unwilling to develop policy for physician-assisted death in the face of terminal illness which is causing great suffering. And most of the physicians I have dealt with are unwilling to talk about it. This is also true of my oncologist. He didn't want to discuss anything about euthanasia.

Good Lord, we don't let that happen to our cats and dogs but we allow it with humans.
My loving little dog died in my arms a few years back. Yes, I wept, but he was saved from suffering.
Politicians, of any persuasion,
fearful of the next election, don't take into account those with
terrible, painful, terminal

That's the way things are. I don't know how much longer I will have to live, months, a year.

But I am at peace. I have all that when the going gets rough that's what I will do. My wife and family are fully informed about this. I have told all my friends. Some are shocked, but by far most say I am courageous.

I don't think about the end, nor do I look forward to it. I have led a most fortunate life. I am surrounded by family and friends.
Sometimes we cry together for what is ending. Sometimes we laugh.

After these experiences, I have three pieces of advice. First, get a second opinion. For all my university degrees, I simply believed the first surgeon. I never asked for a second opinion.
The second is for politicians.
Don't be so lily livered. Take a stand against suffering and illnesses which are awful and go on and on. Terminal is just that.
So let people end their suffering.
And finally, I have advice for the readers of this article.

Join the cause and support change. Join an organisation such as Dying With Dignity.
This article was originally published at <http://theconversation.edu.au>

But I need to depart this world and when the going gets rough that's
what I will do. My wife and family
are fully informed about this. I have told all my friends. Some are
shocked, but by far most say I am
courageous.

I don't think about the end, nor
do I look forward to it. I have led a most fortunate life. I am
surrounded by family and friends.
Sometimes we cry together for
what is ending. Sometimes we laugh.

After these experiences, I have
three pieces of advice. First, get a second opinion. For all my
university degrees, I simply
believed the first surgeon. I never
asked for a second opinion.
The second is for politicians.
Don't be so lily livered. Take a stand against suffering and
illnesses which are awful and go
on and on. Terminal is just that.
So let people end their suffering.
And finally, I have advice for
the readers of this article.

Join the cause and support
change. Join an organisation
such as Dying With Dignity.
This article was originally
published at <http://theconversation.edu.au>

Bowel cancer? Me?
How could that be?
I've been so fit
throughout my life,
eaten porridge, been
as regular as
clockwork. My diet
was always well balanced. There has been no history of cancer in the family. Cancer? Me?

Bleeding led to a CT scan, and,
after that, there was no doubt
about it. I was told by the surgeon
that bowel surgery was very
successful and so about eight
years ago, I had the first
operation. But this turned into
eight, each worse than the previous one.

And, I've ended up with a bag
and terminal cancer.

A couple of personal details will
set the scene. I am now 72. I'm
married and have twin sons who
are about 40. I'm a retired
academic from Swinburne
University, Melbourne, where my
last position was as director of the
doctorate in business
administration program.

Why so many surgeries you ask?
Every six months after the first
operation, the cancer kept on
reappearing at the point where the
bowel was joined.

After the fourth one, a spot
appeared on my liver. I had
surgery for that. While lying on
the gurney after the operation and just after coming to consciousness, the surgeon came up and said, "Sorry, there's nothing we can do for you. You have so many spots on your liver; I

didn't know where to start."

Bald news indeed, and delivered
with such sensitivity!

After being discharged from the
hospital I recovered quite quickly
but one day I found myself in a
panic attack about dying.

My wife knew. My sons knew.
But who to talk to? I mentioned
this to a friend who suggested I
ring Dying With Dignity Victoria
for a talk. I was so panicked that I did just that.

The secretary, Rowena White,
answered the phone and I poured
out my woes and debilitating fear
to her.

She listened with astonishing
care. She didn't interrupt my
tearful, fearful statement. And she
sympathised in clear terms with
astonishing understanding.

When I ran out of words, she
indicated she would get Rodney Syme, the chairman of Dying With Dignity Victoria, to phone me
back.

I didn't imagine he would. To
my surprise he did, twice.
I was not a member of the organisation, just one more
person in despair.

I met Dr Syme, who brought me
to the inevitable position that
dying is part of life, we just don't know when that's going to be.

He said that preparation was
the key. Prepare to be able to make
a choice when the going gets

tough.
That down-to-earth sensible talk
helped me to shift gear into
acceptance of the inevitable. I was
also having a couple of heart
issues so I asked my heart

specialist, whether any of the heart
pills I am taking would enable me
to end my life.

Unwilling as he was to say so, he
nevertheless told me that one of
the pills I was taking would
indeed end my life. I would go to sleep and then my heart would
stop.

For that bit of information I am eternally grateful. My abject fear of death ended at that point. The pills gave me choice.

illnesses. And it's not just cancer,
but motor neurone disease,
Parkinson's disease, Alzheimer's
and so on.

For that bit of information I am eternally grateful. My abject fear of death ended at that point. The pills gave me choice.

I was in control of my life and
that would save me from palliative
care and people who could keep
me alive but in a terrible state.
But I also came to understand
that it was an offence for anyone
to be near me or assist me in any
way to depart this world because
of debilitating painful illness. How silly is that?

Politicians, praise be not all, but
unhappily most by far, are
unwilling to develop policy for
physician-assisted death in the
face of terminal illness which is
causing great suffering. And most
of the physicians I have dealt with
are unwilling to talk about it. This
is also true of my oncologist. He
didn't want to discuss anything
about euthanasia.

Good Lord, we don't let that happen to our cats and dogs but
we allow it with humans.
My loving little dog died in my
arms a few years back. Yes, I wept,
but he was saved from suffering.
Politicians, of any persuasion,
fearful of the next election, don't
take into account those with
terrible, painful, terminal

That's the way things are. I don't know how much longer I will have
to live, months, a year.
But I am at peace. I have all that I need to depart this world and when the going gets rough that's
what I will do. My wife and family
are fully informed about this. I have told all my friends. Some are
shocked, but by far most say I am
courageous.

I don't think about the end, nor
do I look forward to it. I have led a most fortunate life. I am
surrounded by family and friends.
Sometimes we cry together for
what is ending. Sometimes we laugh.

After these experiences, I have
three pieces of advice. First, get a second opinion. For all my
university degrees, I simply
believed the first surgeon. I never
asked for a second opinion.
The second is for politicians.
Don't be so illy livered. Take a stand against suffering and
illnesses which are awful and go
on and on. Terminal is just that.
So let people end their suffering.
And finally, I have advice for
the readers of this article.

Join the cause and support
change. Join an organisation
such as Dying With Dignity.
This article was originally
published at
<http://theconversation.edu.au>

It turned out that I started
bleeding from the bowel six
months after the liver surgery so
the cancer was 'back in the bowel'
and I changed hospitals and
surgeons. I would've bled to death
had I not had surgery. The cancer
was back on the join yet again. So
there was nothing for it but to
have more surgery. This time they
found that there were two spots on
my liver but nothing else. The first
surgeon had got it very wrong.
I had both bowel surgery and
liver surgery at the same time. But
pathological examination of the
removed bowel showed there was
a large cancer which no one knew
anything about. It was very flat,
very thin, and was not detected by
the CT scans. That explained why
the cancer kept appearing on the
join. It was upstream of the join.
Fortunately that ended the bowel
cancer.

I then had chemotherapy and radiotherapy as it was and still is, that seemed to end my problems.
But cancer is a sneaky beast. I had a follow up CT scan after the
chemotherapy and there were two
spots on my liver.

So in March this year I had yet another resection. It was a difficult operation because of the
placement of the spots. Within
three weeks of the operation I
contracted septicaemia and had
invasive thoracic surgery for that.
I recovered.

But in June this year I had a
follow up CT scan. There were
spots on my liver, lungs,
and most probably
stomach. I was told that
there was no more
surgery to be had.